Advances in Microbial Physiology, Vol. 37

The fruit, called a "sloe", is a drupe millimetres in diameter, black with a purple-blue waxy bloom, ripening in autumn, and harvested - traditionally, at least in the UK, in October or November after the first frosts. And this is, besides the homely poetical language expressed in the purest blank verse, the masterly manner in which Schiller managed to introduce the historical and legendary materials at his disposal, and to imprint the unmistakable stamp of local colour upon his production.
